

Embassy of the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela to the United States

Students Demonstrations in Venezuela

Recent news articles have reported on a series of university student demonstrations in Venezuela in response to a set of constitutional reforms that will be voted on in a national referendum scheduled for December 2. The reports, though, have made misleading claims about the students' demonstrations and the government's response to them. The reports also fail to recognize the steps the government has taken to expand access to university-level education for all Venezuelans.

Recent Student Demonstrations in Venezuela

While there have been recent student demonstrations this year in Venezuela, the media has failed to report on the many accommodations made for students and their concerns.

The largest demonstrations, with estimated attendance of 6,000 university students (of the 200,000 in Caracas alone), have enjoyed the full protection of Venezuela's police forces. These protections comply with Article 68 of the 1999 Constitution, which protects the rights of all Venezuelans to peaceably assemble. And unlike during past governments, when student demonstrations were regularly repressed by police forces, students, including some leaders who are linked to opposition political parties like Primero Justicia and Bandera Roja, have recently been granted high-level meetings with government officials and institutions:

On June 5, 2007, a group of students met with the president of Venezuela's National Tribunal of Justice, Luisa Estela Morales, to whom they presented a petition protesting the government's decision not to renew the broadcast license of a television station, RCTV.

On June 6, 2007, Venezuela's Attorney General, Isaias Rodriguez, met with student representatives regarding the RCTV case.

On June 7, 2007, a group of university students was given the right to speak before a session of Venezuela's National Assembly, where they expressed their disagreement with the government over the RCTV case. Speaking at the opening of the session, which was broadcast on national television, National Assembly President Cilia Flores stated, "Let us listen to the different viewpoints, the different tendencies. Then everyone can come up with their own conclusions."

On November 1, 2007, a group of students met with the directors of the National Electoral Council and presented a petition to delay a national referendum set for December 2 to the directors of Venezuela's electoral authority, the National Electoral Council.

On November 7, 2007, a group of 10 student representatives met with Morales of the National Tribunal of Justice, to whom they presented a petition calling for the delay of a national referendum scheduled for December 2.

On November 12, 2007, Minister of Interior and Justice Pedro Carreño met with the presidents of 20 universities in Venezuela, where he restated the government's respect of university autonomy and the right of students to peaceably assemble.

These meetings make clear that the government has been willing to meet with student demonstrators and hear their concerns, an accommodation few other countries can similarly claim to regularly offer.

*This year alone,
opposition
university students have met with high government officials on six separate occasions*

Embassy of the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela to the United States

Media Coverage of the Demonstrations

Much of the criticism the government has recently received regarding student demonstrations has been caused by distorted media coverage. This isn't the first time this has happened – during the events that led to the coup of April 2002, the media falsely circulated news claiming that supporters of President Chavez had violently attacked opposition demonstrators. This was proven to have been false.

Regarding the constitutional reforms, opposition student protests in various cities have received significantly more media coverage than pro-reform protests, giving the impression that Venezuela's students are overwhelmingly opposed to the changes. The media has thus far minimized or outright ignored demonstrations by students in favor of the reforms. Similarly, legitimate police actions against illegal activity by opposition protestors have been portrayed as "repression."

One of the incidents that has received the most media coverage occurred on November 7, as students returned to the campus of the Central University of Venezuela after a march to the headquarters of the National Tribunal of Justice. As students testified in the National Assembly, a group of opposition students stormed the School of Social Work – whose students had peacefully advocated in favor of the constitutional reforms – and set the building on fire.

Police forces were alerted, but, in keeping with Article 7 of the Law of Universities, did not enter the campus of the university. (Article 7 allows them to enter only when approved by the university president.) University employees, bystanders and members of Civil Protection groups managed to evacuate the building, thus preventing serious injuries or death. In the midst of the events, opposition student leaders claimed on live television that they were being attacked by people aligned with the government. Opposition students showed pictures of armed men, failing to mention that these individuals were helping evacuate the School of Social Work and were firing their guns into the air only in self-defense and to allow the trapped students to safely escape.

Recent videos from bystanders and local media outlets have shown the violent acts perpetuated by opposition students and other unknown individuals around the School of Social Work.

In another incident, after a meeting with the directors of the National Electoral Council on November 1, one group of student demonstrators attempted to chain themselves to the building while another charged through a police line. The resulting melee left six police officers injured and one student demonstrator facing charges for possessing 20 liters of gasoline. After the incident, the president of the National Electoral Council, Tibisay Lucena stated: "We were surprised at our good faith effort when, at the conclusion of this meeting, a group of them tried, aggressively, to chain themselves to the stairs of the headquarters of National Electoral Council, thus violating the cordial and peaceful spirit that was present during the meeting. These acts constitute a meaningless and unjustifiable aggression to what has been a democratic practice of the electoral council."

University Students in Venezuela

The government of President Hugo Chavez has made the availability of higher education a priority. In 1992, there were 362,000 university-level students in Venezuela, a number that grew to only 366,000 by 1998. As of 2006, there were 774,000 university-level students. This drastic increase has been caused by the construction and opening of seven new universities during President Chavez's presidency, a dramatic increase as compared to the one new university opened in Venezuela during the years of 1983 and 1998.

Due to government policies on education, the number of university students in Venezuela almost doubled from 1998 to 2006, while seven new universities have been opened since 1998

Embassy of the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela to the United States

The government of Venezuela respects the rights of students and of all Venezuelans to exercise their right to peaceably assemble as granted by Article 68 of the 1999 Constitution. The government also expects students and all Venezuelans to respect the rule of law. The record shows that no other government in contemporary Venezuelan history has granted students as much access to high-level government officials and institutions to hear their grievances.

For more news and information about Venezuela, please visit our website:
[http://www.venezuela-us.org/
prensa@venezuela-us.org](http://www.venezuela-us.org/prensa@venezuela-us.org)